Dear Sir:

I am writing in reference to Coach Gordon Bragg's dismissal as head football coach for Appomattox High Scool.

Unfortunately I have not been associated with Coach Bragg for a number of years and cannot rightly judge the situation which now exists but I do wonder how so many people could be wrong in their opinion. Judging from your newspapers,(Was given a backlog of your paper all at one time), many people are deeply concerned -- people whom I admire, respect and above all believe.

However, aside from those people, I speak for myself in saying that during my stay at Appomattox High School Coach Bragg was certainly a total coach, a total man, and above all commanded the total respect of all.

Having known Coach Bragg, I doubt seriously that he has changed. Therefore, for the benefit of the school, I do hope he will accept reinstatement if and when the school board realizes its error and reconsiders its decision.

Good luck coach!

Sincerely,
Charles "Sandy" Burks

Learn By Doing

Members of the 9th grade Vocational Agricultural classes at Appomattox County High School have been putting to use what they have learned in their Vocational Agricultural classes this spring. This garden has been planted and worked by these boys. Some of the jobs they have performed are as follows: preparing seed bed, taking soil samples, fumigating the soil with methal bromide for weed control, fertilizing and liming according to soil sample takes, spacing and laying off the rows, planting, and applying insecticides each week. Each boy has twenty square feet of garden space with each boy planting five different vegetables. W. T. Johnson, their instructor of Voc. Agri., says the boys have worked very faithfully and have shown a great deal of interest in the garden. He also stated that he is pleased with the progress of the garden to date.

Operation "Safety Break"

The busy intersection of two main highways, U.S. Routes 460 and 24, was the location for a travelers "safety break" booth which was set up and manned by the Sherwill 4-H Club of Concord. This was held from 1 o'clock until 5 o'clock on Sunday, May 31st, the busiest day of the first long holiday of the summer - Memorial Day week end.

Mr. Charlie Johnston, who operates the Big Horn Market, contributed the use of the grassy corner lot, which was perfect for use by the group.

Large signs were painted by members and erected at various locations along Rt. 460, east and west, and on Rt. 24. Windshields were washed and free coffee and Pepsi - cola, contributed by Pepsi - cola Bottling Co. of Lynchburg, were served. Litter bags were also distributed. Robinson Funeral Home of Appomattox erected a tent on the site for shelter from the sun and rain.

The Campbell County Rescue Squad stationed one of their rescue vehicles at the location ably manned by Mr. Shirely and Mr. Langford.

The highway was heavily traveled that Sunday afternoon and many people from different states stopped for a rest. They seemed most appreciative of the service offered by the club.

By putting forth a little time and effort, the members of the Sherwill 4-H Club, along with the helpfulness of all those who contributed, would like to think that they may have helped to save a life over the week end.

So You Are a Protestor

Deut. 19:14

Text: " . . . Remove not thy neighbor's landmark, . . ." (Deut. 19:14). For ages now, we have left the old standards that made our nation great. The younger generation wants to protest everything. I would like to direct my remarks to you this week, and I trust that we may be able to enlighten you just a little concerning the subject of "Protesting".

You are protesting everything that is fixed -- the Establishment, the Law, the System, the Standard; you say because it has reduced you to a non-person -- a number.

So, now you have decided you must tear it all down, burn it, and start all over again. That sounds exciting to say the least, but before you go ahead with the whole thing and discover you do not have the faintest idea how to put it together again -- why don't you consider going somewhere where the bottom really is? India, where the life expectancy is thirty years old and where tens of thousands die of starvation every year, or one of the many Asian countries where a simple disease will wipe out a whole village. Or, consider going where the diseased and starving die in the street with no one to claim their bodies until the death wagon comes to pick them up the next day and bury them by the millions in these poverty and disease - stricken lands, and those few who have been trained and sent by the very establishment you wish to tear down.

Now if you really sincere and want to start on the bottom, why don't you take off for some of these far away places where there is no establishment? And, if you really want to make things better as you claim, your efforts will meet no resistance.

It is my guess that your sincerity is a farce, You are not really interested in building -- you are wanting to take over what the establishment has built.

Anyone can tear down; it takes a man to build something up. In conclusion, let me say that the real problem is a rebellion against God and not the society. If you had been educated with the "Reading, writing and the Hickory stick" as mother and dad, our society wouldn't be in the mess you have created and are blaming the "Establishment" for these days.

Young Man Brightens Dark Tobacco Outlook

by James Noles,
Extension Agent, Appomattox District Office

A sunny day visit with Glenn Martin, Jr., might brighten your outlook on dark tobacco. He radiates confidence in the future of the commodity as well as his ability to produce it. What a study in contrasts!

Glenn Martin, Jr., is one of a rare breed. He is a young man in his early twenties who returned to the family farm. He's serious about it too. A young man starting in farming nowadays is unusual all right. One like Glenn, Jr., who depends on dark tobacco as the backbone of his farming operation is a rare type indeed -- a few years ago he was an Appomattox FFA member and grew dark tobacco as one of his projects. Since then he pulled his hitch in the U.S. Navy and is back home farming practically full time.

He also served as President of the Appomattox Young Farmer's Club. His farming operation includes about five acres of dark tobacco, one acre of burley tobacco, 15 acres of soybeans and joint interest with his dad in a beef cow-calf herd. Glenn, Jr., maintains, however, that dark tobacco pays the major portion of the bills.

Glenn, Jr., learned from his daddy that being "above average" usually pays well. Back in '63 when it got so dry, an irrigation system was added to dark tobacco. This irrigation system is still on hand and Glenn, Jr., says he'd hate to grow tobacco without it. Last year he grew five acres with an average yield exceeding 2,400 lbs. per acre.

How much is 2,400 lbs. per acre? The Appomattox County average last year was 1,443 lbs. per acre, (Compare this with the just under 1,300 lb. average yield recorded for the 14 counties.) By any yardstick, this is good farming!

I listened while he and Appomattox extension agent, Jim Smith standing ankle deep in beautiful tobacco plants, talked tobacco. Just the names of the chemicals give pause for thought!

The production of dark tobacco is involved and like all farming, risky. One of the big problems is finding help, particularly at planting and harvesting time, Except for the full-time farmer, these days by 8 a.m., the country is pretty near empty of men willing and able to work. Most of them have "answered the call" of B&W, GE, Craddock-Terry, Unroyal, Stockpole, Burlington Industries and other locally situated industrial plants. Thus the farmers must help each other, invest in labor saving equipment, eliminate high labor using crops or a combination of these approaches plus others perhaps.

What about labor saving equipment for Dark Tobacco? A news article about that subject would not be as long as the title. Sure, some research is being done. In Maryland and Kentucky they have new fangled machines that will cut and spear the Burley Tobacco stalks. This is experimental.

A way has yet to be found to develop a machine to cut dark tobacco without ruining it. Even if such a machine were perfected the cost of it probably would be too high.

Small allotments, experienced growers, weather risks, hand labor, average age of growers, seasonal labor load, market outlook; these and other items cloud the dark tobacco alternative. Nevertheless there are bright spots also. The allotment is on a per acre basis. No poundage limit is set as is the case with flue tobacco. The investment to get started is about the smallest for any type of farming; time is the big input.

Recent studies indicate a range of 300 to 500 hours of labor per acre are required for dark tobacco. This starts with plant bed preparation and concludes with selling the tobacco. These same studies showed an average return per hour of operator-family labor of $1.65 in 1967. Dark tobacco average prices have for the past two years shown increasing strength. But the costs of chemicals, hired labor, and other items used in production have also increased. A continued strong demand is a must. Still as of 1969 the returns per acre and per hour of labor did show definite improvement.

Thus the situation is looking better. With improved prices and more good, young growers like Glenn Martin, Jr., interested, maybe the dark leaf situation will continue to brighten. A strong foreign market is a must. Another article will highlight some additional considerations along this line.

"Ice" For The Watermelon

Anyone with a watermelon late Saturday afternoon could have found the "ice" to cool it at the home of the late F. Allen O'Brien near Vera. A brief but fairly heavy rain about 6 p.m. left a heavy deposit of hail around the road bank on Rt. 24 at the farm and more near the barn. For farmers in the area, the rain was welcome, but hail stripped growing corn in fields planted by Elliott Torrence and others, causing considerable damage. Chief Fire Warden David M. Smith notified the Times-Virginian of the unusual "snow in June."
